Excerpt: . . . superior external circumstances, and from which, during every moment of his life, he will derive the most beneficial influences. We will now compare these systems, if possible, without prejudice, and ascertain whether it will not henceforth be for the interest of every individual immediately to abandon the one and to adopt the other. It has been, of late especially, the practice of many members of the Old World, to call the principles and practices of the New World by every foul and degrading epithet; to traduce and vilify it by every kind of vulgarism. There is no argument or common sense in these proceedings. And all I shall now say upon this part of the subject is, that what the opponents of the system which we advocate have been reported to have said in parliament, what they have written in the newspapers and other periodicals, and what they have published as their lectures, have been, very generally, the reverse of the truth; and I should not err were I to call them the ravings of insanity. By some of these parties my writings have been falsely quoted, -- by others garbled extracts have been given, and by almost all, the spirit of the whole system, which, I think, no one who ought to speak or write about it can mistake, has been hidden from the public, and a spirit of opposite character has been attributed to it. In all I have written and published my...
