No doubt you have suspected that the black Dora, who came to our summer-house, was my Princess Mina; and so she was! She has gone back, poor thing! to the town where her old mistress lived, in hopes to find a slave she was very fond of, and set him free. She went once to rescue a friend of her mother s, was seized and sold, and lived for a year with the good Mrs. Wilkins. But Mina was not happy. She wanted to learn, and to be free; so she ran away the second time, and came to us. Mina has something of her mother s gift. She sees sights, hears sounds, and things are told her she dbesn t know how; only they seem truer than anything else. When she wanted to go South for her mother s friend, all at once she saw a long line open, like a path, and at the end of it a city, and a negro in it, weeping, and holding her hands out toward Mina. Then Mina thought she must go, for it was a vision. So she set forth, with out money or friends, without even knowing the way. She never slept under a roof from the time of starting; but hid by day in swamps or woods, and travelled all the long, cold nights, when white people were asleep. The woman she rescued was so much older than...
