A WESTMORLAND VILLAGE CHAPTER I. A LAKE LAND VALLEY AND ITS PEOPLE. The traveller who climbs up from the Windermere railway station to the head of Kirkstone Pass will find himself, when he has mounted the steep rise by St. Catherines brow, following a road which runs along one side of the Troutbeck Valley. To his left there is a glorious prospect across the widest and loveliest reach of Windermere; in the foreground the level pastures of Calgarth, and beyond the lake the twin Langdale Pikes, with the peaks of the Cumberland mountains rising in an exquisite combination in the distance. Below him are the wooded banks of the stream which B a gives its name to the dale, and the fells beyond it are the Troutbeck Hundreds, once the common pasture of the farms in the valley, now divided into allotments. The village has less than five hundred inhabitants and consists of little clusters of houses which straggle along the hill-side in a long line for about a mile, with the highroad from Ambleside winding through them. These houses, some of a sombre grey, others gleaming in their fresh whitewash, are half hidden in trees, which dot the grassy hill-side till the green fields end and give place to the dark patches of heather, mingled with the slate tones of the bare rock and vivid bits of colour where the bracken is growing. Further away is the more rugged outline of Wansfell, rocky and...
