Some count their sorrows one by one, But never count their mercies; And grumble when their work is done, Yet strut with well-filled purses. And give such consequential airs, That one would think them solely The patentees of righteous prayers, To help the meek and lowly. Which breeds such bitter, rank disgust Within the godly liver, That hes inclined to think their trust Is not in God, the Giver. Still, if it is, they fall far short Of being thankful creatures; And simply make Gods mercies sport, To lengthen out their features. A ROYAL DIALOGUE. George III. --Curse it! a thousand times, I curse it! Prince Of Wales. --Curse what George III. --Why this d d farce of keeping up the Myths and fashions of the past--the marriage Of our tender ones to German snobs, this False alliance with confederate powers. Prince Of Wales. --Oh, dont say that. George III. --Yes, boy; I mean it all; Whats more, this game of King is playing out My nerves; I sicken of it all. Tis time The people rise against my rule, and slay The harpies of my court. I know there is That feeling spread abroad. A ROYAL DIALOGUE. Ill Prince Of Wales. --Oh, no such thing. Why pa, the people think the world of me; Besides, if they become too impudent Well have them taken to the Tower, and serve Them worse than dogs. George III. --My son, those days have...
